leading features: will embrace the "geometrical" of the community; the situation of the village; the general character of the education, and the extension of mechanical and agricultural science.

The location should, at once bespeak for it a progressive civilization, being surrounded by a fertile soil, and a population remarkable for its enterprise and industry, and having no equal in this and the neighboring counties to supply their want of facilities. A community, circumstances so surely mark, should be in direct communication with each other, and effort will be made to render the Reader interesting to all classes of citizens. No other paper is prepared to make it a welcome addition in the city prior and by the farmer's desire, an acceptable companion to the man of letters.

the inferior and inefficient. The great and noblest of our countrymen will be among its immediate victims. Its policies will either force or will take a decided stand in the cause of the people, for he is of them, and with them. It is the duty of the conductors of the Press to bring to the Administration of their country their support, when its course shall be marked by wisdom and a true regard to the public good. It should not censure merely for the sake of censure, and it is too frequently the case, in the disordered spirit of dissension, to look outside the narrow circle of those who have made up their minds to support or oppose. It should rather shrink from the responsibility of intermeddling upon the adoption of measures which will be with or without the community. "Our country, our whole country," should be the policy to guide them through the political labyrinth.

It may be due, he, will fearlessly, expose the crimes and corruptions, wherever they exist; and he will not shrink from denouncing the delinquent; for unrestrained power is dangerous when placed in the hands of one man, and the power of a few is dangerous to as great as the voice of a free and virtuous race. We shall firmly and steadfastly support every individual, unconnected with any name or guile, whose efforts are directed to the promotion of the rights of man, by party management, the full expression of unprejudiced sentiment, and whose 'used and abused' position is a permanent source of honor and integrity. We shall advocate the cause of pure, unadulterated democracy—not that we are in opposition to the rights of the people, but that we are in favor of their obedience to the dictates of party and not to the commands of a few. We shall support our leaders, without enquiring into the propriety of their motives or the propriety of their actions; but that we shall not sacrifice the dignity of the people themselves; in their own assemblies, to nominate their own representatives, and to elect their own officers.

conducting our cause, as we do not believe, in any form the right of dictation in it, so we hold ourselves alone responsible for the correctness of our doctrines. If they should be in conflict with those of our brethren laboring in the same vocation, we shall not; for that is simply, disguise or suppress them, for, opinion of sentiment must always lead to a violation of principles, and an examination of principles to the development of truth. many diseases to which the first dentition, or teething, subjects Children; ought to address every parent to attend to the state of the Teeth. And it also proves the universal truth that exists between the Teeth and several important organs of the human system.

Thomas Bell, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons in London, in his Anatomy and Physiology of the Teeth, pages 68, 69, and 70, thus writes: "The Teeth are the seat of several fatal diseases, and many other malignant affections of the stomach, and intestines, terminating in a state of inflammation, and usually a few of the diseases consequent upon irritation produced by teething.

The shedding of teeth is no less worthy of attention. As extruding the transitory teeth is attended may injure or destroy the pulp of the permanent teeth, which is forming in the jaw; and on the other hand, by leaving said teeth too long in the mouth, may give a wrong direction to the permanent teeth, and consequently deform the face and be a source of pain and regret through out life.

According to the sympathy that exists between the teeth and the brain, stomach, and lungs, and the whole nervous system, it proves that a diseased state of those organs must be detrimental to the general health of the system in which it is children.
